To everyone studying at the Department of the Combined Graduated Program in Law and Politics

Dean of the Graduate School of Law
Nagoya University
Professor Fumio Jimbo

I most sincerely welcome all our students, with their great dreams and drive, to the Nagoya University Graduate School of Law's Department of Combined Graduate Program in Law and Political Science.

The Nagoya University School of Law started out as the Nagoya University Law and Economics Department and Political Science Department under the old system in 1948, shortly after the end of World War II. In the following year, 1950, the Law Department and Economics Department were split up and made independent of each other in line with reforms to the educational system. Shortly after, the graduate school was established in 1953.

The School, at first, was situated within the outer walls of the air-raid damaged Nagoya Castle where it occupied an old wooden barracks that used to belong to the No. 6 Infantry Regiment of the former Imperial Army. In 1959 it was moved to its present day location at Higashiyama Campus. The School and Department grew through the efforts of staff and students, initially making do with meager facilities and low staff numbers. The bad conventions and conservativism that had hijacked our old and better traditions were jettisoned, and a free and open academic ethos unshackled by authoritarianism took shape.

In the 60 years since then, the Law Department and Graduate School have come to hold a prominent position in the Chubu region as one component of a major Japanese university. They offer to society much excellent research, and have helped spawn a great number of talented people. The Department and Graduate School have needed to adapt to the changing times and society, and have engaged in various organizational changes and expansions, as well as improvements and enhancements to the research and teaching system. Even so, we have continued to enjoy an open-minded ethos and progressive spirit born from a freedom that shirks established authority and which continues to this day. Though the times may change, and our system, organization, and facilities alter, the spirit and essence of our teaching and research that we have inherited from a forbearers shall go on.

The Researcher Program, Applied Law Program, and Comparative Law Program in our Combined Graduate Program in Law and Political Science each have different purposes in accordance with the people they aim to train. However, the programs are open to each other which will give you an advantage in terms of the development of your research theme and your future as a specialist. I truly hope you shall peruse this pamphlet, talk to your supervisors to make your research and study plans, and strive to achieve your goals.

Regular courses are conducted in lecture and seminar format. Students are expected to prepare a topic and present their findings to both colleagues and faculty. Final grades are assessed mainly from presentations and the subsequent discussion. For that reason, class participation is very important. Students may also attend intensive lectures and seminars given by visiting academics and professionals.

As a large part of instructor's evaluation is based on class discussion, absences will affect the student's grades and may result in a failing grade. Students are expected to attend all classes.

Important Note: If you cannot attend a class, you should inform the instructor beforehand, including the reason for your absence, and receive his / her permission. Failure to do so may result in a failing grade.

3. Master's Thesis Writing Program

As said above, the School has established a "Master's thesis writing program*." Graduate students, following the guidance of their supervisor, must independently write their thesis within the framework of the program.
